Broken Willow, Appledorn and Clay Renewed

Good people the holiday towns of Broken Willow, Appledorn and Clay has been rebuilt. Their former buildings and Tavern were found lacking and torn down and replaced. Also with the dry season we had they were able to find high ground a build more buildings for the people of the towns. This is also why the Guild Of Merchants has not visited these towns (not to mention the lack of holiday GNI).

In the case of Broken Willow the former town was torn down and the location moved. It is now further south into Sidhe/Tuar lands. The reason was that a small group from the town of Heartwood was venturing on a contract and found this "lost" location. They surmise it was from a time before the kingdom was created. The Baroness of Killborne sent many guards and artisans to reconstruct this town.

WAR

The war with the Taur continues. The Queens Army holds well the boarders of the kingdom and has kept the foul beasts at bay with some ease. Within the last few months the attacks have relented and the Queen has ordered temporary forts and ports built to better hold the area. House Vornhild, House Killborne and House Rust Crow have lent their support as well. The Taur seem to have turned to infighting and have yet to make a substantial push. I also learned that a diplomat from one of the Minotaur was sent to Broken Willow early in the summer to speak with Magistrate Barthelomew of Eshrain. The talks must have went well as the tribe he spoke with has held off any attacks to the Queens forces.

Merchants Guild

The Guild of Merchants would like to announce their first printing of coin. They are beginning to distribute it through out the kingdom. The guild will accept this as proper payment for any and all of their goods. Many feel within the Kingdom that this is a ploy to regain some of their lost political power with by controlling the flow of Maori. The guild claims that most Maori is useless to the common citizen as the need only minor amounts for their crafting and would like to put it to better use. The Hove Academy as well supports this decision by the guild. They state that the Maori would be better severed in the hands of scientist and magi to fully unlock its potential. Many nobles have spoken out against this and refuse to use the coin or let it into their lands. Which prompted the guild to announce that no one has to use the coin, but they will only have business dealings with nobles and lands that will accept this new for of currency. The Queen has yet to denounce of support this decision by her nobles.

Greshin's Summer Gathering

Good people I hope that you enjoyed my get together this summer. My assistant told me a great many people showed up and had a wonderful time. I do so apologize for my absence as I was called away on an important mater that needed my attention. It seems my tireless work for the kingdom is never done. I hope my fool of an assistant did not botch up to much in front of you all. I would like to thank Bane for all his effort in helping with this event. I look forward to doing this again, this time I hope to meet all of you.

Submissions from You

This area is dedicated to the personal submissions of the citizens of the kingdom and beyond. As I can not report on everything with in the Kingdom.

Help is but a Virtue

Timeless is all the meaning I need. The endless rowing of the night is whispering to me. I think not that much is taken in the giving. The words here are to be left for them that may know sorrow of the rebirth and the joy of the end. Let that which is lost always be lifted to what has been spoken of and replaced.

In the Town of Broken Willow, a story passed from Voth to the Bard Corbin

"Having been on return from a secret envoy, the Town Guard happened to stumble upon a Half-Sidhe hiding behind the barracks. Not only was this disgrace relieving himself on the building, but his weapons were UN-peace bound. This was an immediate sign of something, and the guards proceeded to escort him to the center of town. He took a seat on a table while they questioned him- immediately offending the lady mage Alyssa. His actions and words having crossed her, she proceeded to assert the power of the law in Broken Willow.

There was no chance for him, falling over and off the table; he was dead.

The man was not in a state of dying, not crying for mercy. Lady mage Alyssa had brought down the mighty hammer of justice, and the man was dead. But such a fury was she in that this act would not satiate her. With scorching eyes she swung her mace, striking his body with such force that the entirety of it exploded into a burst of flames; injuring all those standing near her.

The lady mage Alyssa must have felt compassion that day, for as easily as she delivered his death- she brought the burning fire of rebirth to this man that had offended her so. And from the fire he stepped forth, unscathed and pure."

So the tale is told,

Bard Corbin of Broken Willow

There is contention in the tale, from the lady mage Alyssa, that she never used her right hand at all. But those blessed enough to be present (Voth, Batarus, and Dol) claim that what they witnessed and passed on to me is the substantial truth.
